01 Overview & Quick Facts

LDV South Africa confirmed G90 for local introduction in March 2024 as part of its broader passenger and commercial expansion. The vehicle remains an upcoming model because no finalized South African derivative names, prices, launch date or retail specification matrix have been published. The official announcement is sufficient for advance buyer research, but it is not a substitute for final seven- and eight-seat variants. The official announcement establishes the product's role with useful precision. G90 is a luxury MPV, not an SUV or panel van. LDV intends to offer seven- and eight-seat configurations. The seven-seat arrangement is described with individually adjustable captain's chairs, while equipment may include quilted leather upholstery, an oversized panoramic sunroof, a multi-screen infotainment layout extending across the dashboard and next-generation assisted-driving technology. The phrase depending on model is important: not every announced item can be assigned to both seating layouts before grades are published. Much remains genuinely unknown for South Africa. The announcement does not identify an engine, fuel type, transmission, drivetrain, dimensions, cargo capacity, towing approval, wheel size, safety count, charging hardware, warranty detail or...

Buyer Summary

"Worth monitoring, but far too incomplete for grade comparisons."

G90 has a clear reason to exist: seven- or eight-seat luxury MPV packaging with an ambitious cabin concept. The confirmed captain chairs, quilted upholstery direction, panoramic roof and multi-screen dashboard make it relevant before launch. They do not establish a powertrain, final equipment, price or delivery date. The correct stance is informed patience. Families and shuttle operators should compare finalized derivatives only after LDV publishes a local brochure and retail matrix. Any deposit decision should wait for a dated local order form naming the derivative and refundable terms.

City Driving	An MPV can simplify passenger loading through wide side access and a flexible cabin, but LDV has not yet published the local G90's dimensions, door hardware, cameras or turning circle. Urban buyers should measure parking only after the final vehicle is available. The seven-seat captain-chair plan may ease second-row comfort and third-row passage; the eight-seat arrangement may increase capacity while changing aisle and child-seat access.
Highway	G90's intended luxury role suggests long-distance passenger use, yet no South African engine, transmission, fuel consumption, range or driver-assistance list is finalized. A responsible comparison must wait for those values. When retail vehicles arrive, test all occupied rows for ventilation, noise, charging access and seat comfort, then verify luggage space with seven or eight people aboard. Warranty and roadside terms also need model-specific publication before touring cost can be judged.
Off-Road	The confirmed G90 identity is a luxury MPV, and LDV South Africa has not announced four-wheel drive, low range, ground clearance, wading depth or off-road modes for a local derivative. Buyers travelling on maintained gravel can assess tyres and clearance after launch. Remote-road users need final spare-wheel, underbody, recovery and assistance information. No terrain capability can be inferred from LDV's pickup or SUV products.
Best For	G90 is relevant to larger families, executive transport operators and buyers seeking flexible luxury-MPV seating. They should be willing to wait for final grades, powertrain, luggage figures, safety specification, ownership terms and pricing rather than order from foreign-market assumptions.
